

4.2 BRAKE OPERATION ON RIG

When a Baylor Company Eddy Current Brake is installed on a rig its response may vary depending upon the following items:

- Brake torque capacities may vary + or - 5% between individual units.
- When the brake becomes overheated it will lose some of its torque capacity.
- Normal reaction time for the brake to reach maximum braking torque is approximately 2 seconds. This may vary depending upon the Brake Control System employed.
- Normal reaction time for the brake to decay to zero braking torque is approximately 1-2 seconds, depending upon the Brake Control System employed.
- As the brake ages, the air gap between the rotor and the magnets may increase due to rust or erosion which will cause a decrease in brake output torque.

With all these factors in mind, the operator must learn and get a feel for the brake response time during the early stages of tripping when the loads are lighter.

When the load exceeds the brake capacity note that the brake will not be able to control or properly decelerate the load.

Proper operation of the brake is to apply the Eddy Current Brake before releasing the main drawworks friction brake when tripping into the bore hole.
