Abstract: Phragmites australis (Cyperaceae) is a dominant species in coastal wetlands of the United States. It is a highly invasive species that can outcompete native species and alter the structure and function of wetland ecosystems. The purpose of this study was to investigate the effects of Phragmites invasion on the structure and function of a coastal wetland. We measured the biomass, growth rate, and nutrient uptake of Phragmites and native species in a wetland in Louisiana. We found that Phragmites invasion led to a decrease in the biomass and growth rate of native species, and an increase in the biomass and growth rate of Phragmites. We also found that Phragmites invasion led to a decrease in the nutrient uptake of native species, and an increase in the nutrient uptake of Phragmites. These results suggest that Phragmites invasion can have significant effects on the structure and function of coastal wetlands.
